THE NEW "IT" PAINT: LIMEWASH

It's rare that the paint formulation itself has designers swooning, but when it does, get ready for it to be everywhere! Lime paints are typically used on porous exterior surfaces, like stone, but a new crop of limewash coatings are meant to be used inside on previously painted surfaces and drywall, adding texture and interest, according to Jamie Davis, cofounder of Portola Paints & Glazes. We love how they give color a weathered, lived-in look and bring subtle drama to a space.

Tiffany Howell of design firm Night Palm went all in with color in this dining room, using Wellfleet by Portola limewash on the walls and ceiling to give the space some serious drama. "I especially like the way the light bounces off the wash to create a lushness that gives the room a romantic feel," says Howell.

Shaun Crha of Wrensted Interiors used a soft aqua (Rococo by Portola) to create this calming bedroom. "Instead of working against the less-than-perfect plasterwork in an older home, limewash works with it, enhancing that soulful, old-world quality," Crha explains.

For this bold, desert-inspired bedroom, Los Angeles-based design firm West & Wild paired pumpkin and rust hues using Merida and El Coyoté by Portola. "The limewash's texture created a sense of cohesion between the two colors," says Eric Bach, a partner at West & Wild.

In this moody sink area, designer Jake Arnold used Simmer Down by Portola floor through ceiling to create a cocoon vibe that still felt minimalist. "Limewash allows a space to feel covered without heavy layering," Arnold says.
